Public art can take many forms: for example banners, flags, lighting schemes, street furniture, fencing, paving, signs, sculptures, murals or mosaics. Most successful public art results from a collaborative process involving members of the local community.

Public art can be temporary – for example a special screening of a film or a projection on the facade of a building - or permanent, for example a sculpture on a roundabout, or artworks in a school or hospital, or sited along a river walk way or in a public park.
